TRIP REPORTS:2-9 January – Arrowsmith Range

After some anxious moments trying to find each other at Christchurch airport, we were soon bowling across the plains towards Mount Somers. A few miles past Lake Heron we reached the Cameron Valley and shortly after (about 3pm) it was time to put the body into gear and the mind into neutral for the 4½ hour slog up to Cameron Hut. The plan next day was to climb 700 m to cross Peg Col (1950 m) and find a good campsite in the upper part of Jagged Stream, without losing too much height. By lunchtime, a tentative prospect was still some time and effort further on. However, Peter (S) and Werner were to change all that when they discovered a possible bivvy rock near the Gridiron Stream. After lunch we left our gear and investigated. Only at close range (less than 10 m) did the rock show any sign of accommodation potential. (It had not been used before). While there were certain engineering difficulties to be worked on, we decided that this was the spot and that the tent could be relegated to pack ballast for the trip.

To make the lower chamber fully usable 3 or 4 rocks weighing 2-300 kg each had to be freed, moved to the door, lifted out and dragged upwards to the narrow entrance. This would have been easily accomplished had there been a handy rock to fasten the rope to for setting up a Z-pulley of untold mechanical advantage. However, we had neither a suitable rock nor pulleys, only a collection of slings and carabiners. As luck had it, the only (2) people we saw in the valley in 5 days descended from a climb past the bivvy and before they were aware of it they had been "roped in". By evening, there was very good accommodation for at least four people.

Next morning we headed up through the rather crevassed Gridiron Glacier, sidled across the top of Assault Glacier to Reischek Col (2400 m) and made a short climb from there (100 m) to the summit of one of the Reischek Spires. From there we headed across the Reischek neve to Lawrence Col for lunch, then wandered up the north ridge of Red Peak to a point where a deep notch barred progress. Although we knew this was likely, it was nevertheless frustrating to be little more than 100 m from this fine peak. However, the views were impressive enough.

Next day we headed up the easy and direct snow slopes to Lawrence Peak (2450 m), reaching the summit shortly after 8 am. This seemed a bit early to be contemplating descent! Instead we spent a few hours scrambling along the ridge to the start of the north ridge of Jagged Peak. After an early lunch, the long snow slope of the Jagged Glacier gave us a round trip back to base.

We decided next day to tackle Jagged Peak (2720 m) via the east ridge from Jagged Col. We were a few metres from the snow slopes by the time it was light, and had reached Jagged Col (2350 m) by about 7 am. This left us lots of time to tackle the 400 m ridge and we had got most of the height gain finished with before the sun wilted us. The ridge was mostly loose or doubtful rock with some snow sections mixed in. Some of the obstacles could be by-passed but the crux was the last and largest tower on the ridge which required climbing a steep 20 m vertical groove. This was abseiled on the return. The summit gave exceptionally good views and a spot to have lunch. The descent required at least as much care as the ascent. Once back at Jagged Col the stops could be pulled out again. Glissading roped up may not be a technique in the book, but it worked well as long as the team was more or less co-ordinated.

We decided to make the next day easy by returning to the Cameron Hut by Peg Col. After lunch at the Hut, the afternoon was spent in or around the tarn on the other side of the river. An early start was made the following day, this time for Mount Arrowsmith (excluding PW). The standard route seems to have changed in recent years. The route now used is via East Horn, where ideas of climbing the east ridge of Arrowsmith (2780m) were abandoned as too time consuming. Instead, we descended 2-300 metres onto the South Cameron Glacier and followed the standard couloir route. Heat was the main problem. After lunch on the summit, the descent was made by the same route.

Fourteen hours of sun each day was getting to be rather repetitious, so it was with some relief that the next day was foggy. This was perfect for the walk out down valley and we had just reached the car by the time the sun had started to break through again.

Party was: Urs and Peter Schupbach, Werner Held, Peter Wiles.
